"New York Times," in its financial article. Large purchases for investment account were made in last week's market, while there was an active speculative demand from operators who believe that quotations will sell many points above the current level before winter. The speculative idea is based on the expectation of bountiful crops on a continuance of easy money, on the belief that the Presidential campaign will not upset the business affairs of the country, and on the theory that market values are now quoted under their intrinsic worth. The increasing active demand for high grade securities reflects a return of confidence in business and financial circles. This demand will doubtless continue for a long time to come, inasmuch as there is a large supply of money in the country available for investment purposes, while prices of securities are at a level which will return an attractive yield to the buyer.
